Should I Register My Copyright?

Copyright law is confusing and misunderstood. It is incumbent on graduate students to inform themselves regarding the issues. The following information from UMI should help to guide you in your decisions:

Your dissertation automatically acquires “copyright through the act of creating your manuscript, regardless of registering with the U.S. Copyright Office.” You receive copyright protection from the moment of its creation and it is “fixed in a tangible form.” “A registered copyright, however, allows a court of law to award you monetary damages if your copyright is infringed.”

It is not required that you register your copyright, however. Under the Copyright Act of 1976, “registration makes the copyright public record and ensures [that] a copy of the protected work is deposited in the Library of Congress.” There are additional advantages: (1) You, as the owner, would “have an easier time recovering damages . . . up to $150,000 in statutory damages for intentional infringement without proof of actual loss”—plus attorney fees; and (2) registration creates evidence of validity, which “shifts the burden of proof to the opposing party.” “Authors without copyright registration can claim only actual damages and no attorney fees.”

When you publish your dissertation with UMI Dissertation Publishing, registering for your copyright becomes easy! For $55, UMI/ProQuest will prepare an application in your name, submit your application fee, deposit the required copy of the manuscript, and mail you the completed certificate of registration from the 3ProQuest Information and Learning, p. iii (emphasis supplied).

5Ibid.
Library of Congress. UMI/ProQuest does not acquire copyright for themselves: You own the copyright, and you are free to re-publish your work in whole or in part with whomever you choose—without asking for their permission.8

7Ibid.

8ProQuest Information and Learning, “Publishing Your Doctoral Dissertation,” p. IX.