IE Browser Vulnerability Resolved
Microsoft has released a patch for the Internet Explorer vulnerability that resulted in the recommendations to the university to restrict its use on April 30, 2014. This patch has been installed on most of the university owned Microsoft systems so that it is safe to resume use of Internet Explorer if desired. However, if you work in a department that provides its own personal computer support, you should check with that person to make sure that the patch has been installed on your computer before using IE.

For any personally owned computer systems, make sure that Windows updates have been applied so that the patch is installed. If you have any questions, please contact the Helpdesk at 471-6016 or by email at helpdesk@andrews.edu

Student Films for AFM in Benin

by Becky St. Clair

Alex Swensen, junior documentary film major at Andrews University, served as a student missionary with Adventist Frontier Missions (AFM) during the 2013–2014 school year. Based in Berrien Springs, Michigan, AFM recruits one University student each year to serve as a videographer and photographer for specific projects they maintain around the world.

“My role is to assist them with video production,” says Swensen. “I'm currently working on three films. I've filmed them all and am now sitting in a little room editing film 40 hours a week.”

AFM uses videos as promotional material to demonstrate to potential and current donors what they are doing with donor money. The missionaries on the ground write stories to keep donors updated, but Swensen points out that there's something about a visual medium used to tell stories that allows one to see the story unfolding that is much more powerful.

On a recent AFM trip to Benin, Swensen filmed two projects focusing on the Dendi and Odamari people. These communities are animistic and ritualistic with a strong Muslim influence, so reaching them with Christianity is a challenge.

“Benin is thought to be the birthplace of Voodoo,” says Swensen. “They utilize strange ritualistic sacrifices, witch doctors, talisman, and other heathen practices. There is a basic Muslim dislike for Christians in general within these communities, and a lot of supernatural issues going on. It’s interesting and sometimes frightening.”

After months of scripting the film project and contact with the missionaries on-site, Alex traveled alone to Benin with four checked bags, each weighing 50 pounds, and several carry-ons. His trip was scheduled to last one month, during which time he was expected to gather enough footage to create three 30-minute productions.

“Any time I wasn’t sleeping or eating and it was light outside I was shooting,” he says. “There's essentially no Internet there; although it does exist it rarely works, and when it does it's extremely slow. It was an interesting change of pace for my life during that month.”

Lack of Internet was only one of several challenges Swensen faced while on this project. Weather, the language barrier, lack of showers, and hauling so much luggage on his own were also difficult. The dry season had just started and most days were around 90 degrees. Although there was water, it wasn't heated, and “showers” were just buckets of cold water poured over one’s head.

“Also, I don’t speak French, which is the most commonly spoken language in Benin,” says Swensen. “I worked with translators and a few of the locals were able to speak a little English, but I essentially just learned enough French to tell people that I don't speak French, and to greet people politely.”

The challenges were worth it, however, for the experience and the education.

“I love traveling,” says Swensen. “It's a great experience to be able to learn about different cultures by immersing yourself in them: seeing the sights, getting to know the people, trying local foods. I thrive on new experiences. The opportunity to hear about life and the world from the perspective of the people of Benin was amazing.”

Now back in Berrien Springs, Swensen spends his weeks sifting through hundreds of hours of footage, pulling out clips and segments to tell a story in 30 minutes, three times over. The first of the three videos is completed and will appear on 3ABN on May 30 at 6 p.m. (ET), and will be released on DVD through AFM.

“I really enjoy the process of seeing something like this come together,” says Swensen. “Though it’s somewhat long and tedious at times, it’s a wonderful learning experience for both me and AFM.”

Though this was not his first time traveling for a film project, it was his first time traveling abroad for one. And while he does admit it’s not work for just anyone, he encourages those who are interested to seriously consider working overseas for a mission organization.

“Do it,” he says. “It will totally change your outlook and perspective on life and you will be a better person because of it. You will learn a lot about yourself, other people and God.”

Once he finishes his film degree, Swensen hopes to work for the Adventist Church, helping to enhance the way the Church uses media to reach young people.

“What would happen if the Adventist Church took advantage of the fact that so many young people are spending so much time in front of technology?” asks Swensen. “What if they added to the mix something engaging with underlying positive messages and morals? It would change the world. I want to be a part of that change. I feel God has called me to do that. And I’m happy to do any other bits of good I can in the meantime on my journey there.”

For more information on AFM and their work in Benin and around the world, visit afmonline.org. For updates on Swensen’s Benin and other film projects, visit his website at alexswensen.us.
Envision Magazine Wins National Awards

by Becky St. Clair

Envision, a regular publication produced by the Andrews University Department of Communication, was recently named the best mobile publication in North America by the Associated Church Press (ACP). The award was announced at the oldest and largest Christian Press Association's annual awards banquet, held in Chicago on April 25.

Envision's prestigious "Best in Class" honor was one of five awards won by the Andrews University student publication from among 1,200 entries submitted for judging in the yearly Best of the Christian Press Awards 2013.

"We are indeed proud of the achievements of Debbie Michel and her students," says Keith Mattingly, dean of the College of Arts & Sciences at Andrews University. "Particularly nice is the involvement of our students and their deserved recognition."

Other award-winning entries by the student-produced magazine are:

- Award of Excellence for Student Publications (entire Envision staff)
- Award of Excellence for Reporting and Writing: Feature Article, short format magazine ("Uncalled For? Women in the Seminary" by Melodie Roschman)
- Award of Merit for Reporting and Writing: Personally Useful Article ("Don't Follow Your Dreams: How to be Miserable, Waste Time and Live an Unsatisfying Life" by Melodie Roschman)
- Honorable Mention: Art/Design/Graphics: Design Spread or Story ("From Fear to Eternity" spread by Kristiana Mitacek)

In addition to the printed version of the magazine, Andrews alumnus Kenty Ramdatt designed the mobile app, available on iOS and Android devices.

Professor Develops Early Math Skills Test
Getting help early is critical, but unlike reading, there are very few math assessments for young students that may explain why they struggle to perform calculations such as addition and subtraction.

Compassion Passion
Nurses, doctors and other hospital personnel don't always get to hear the words “thank you” from patients, but they did Thursday from motivational speaker and burn survivor Allison Massari on behalf of all patients.

Massari, who survived a fiery car crash in 1998 and spent more than a year in the hospital, gave a moving talk to Lakeland Health System employees Thursday morning in a presentation at the Howard Performing Arts Center at Andrews University. Her speech was part of Lakeland's celebration of National Hospital Week.

Student Speaks On Nigeria Kidnappings
Lots of attention has come to Nigeria after the kidnapping of hundreds of schoolgirls by the terror group Boko Haram. A local woman born in Nigeria wants people to know this is not the way it normally is in her native land.

Ejiro Elem came to Andrews University with her family in 2005. She says it’s okay for women to get an education in Nigeria. In fact, that’s where she got her first college degree.

Elem says men are very respectful and protective of women in Nigeria, so she says the men involved in the kidnappings are not real Nigerians.

Bringing the Real World to Genesis
The late Siegfried Horn, who at the time was dean of the Theological Seminary at Andrews University, authored the following article. In it, we encounter reasons for thinking twice about using biblical chronology as a measure for the age of the earth. Dr. Horn points out that many dates we rely upon prophetically are not universally embraced for their historicity. He further notes that many dates about which there is little controversy are frequently derived by relying upon secular source material—not from Scripture itself.

New President Named at Union College

Union College has hired its first woman president. Dr. Vinita Sauder replaces John Wagner, retiring this summer.

Ryan Teller, director of public relations at Union College, published the story on the college's website on Friday, May 16:

Dr. Vinita Sauder, currently vice president for strategic initiatives at Southern Adventist University, has accepted the invitation of the Union College Board of Trustees to serve as Union's next president.

The appointment will fill the position soon to be vacated by John Wagner when he retires in June. Wagner joined Union College for a third time in 2011 to help complete the $14.5 million Our Promising Future campaign and build the new Krueger Center for Science and Mathematics.

Although Union College has experienced growth both in the student body and on the physical campus in the form of new and remodeled academic facilities, it was the people who attracted Sauder to the small Midwestern campus. “The personal nature of Union College and the culture of the campus is very appealing to me,” she said. “Union has a strong spirit. It is evident in the way you treat your students and the way the students lead.”

The search for Union’s president was managed by FaithSearch Partners, an external search firm, which was also the firm that found Southwestern Adventist University’s new president, Dr. Kenneth L. Shaw.

The story on Union’s website outlined Sauder’s background and experience.

Sauder's extensive experience in higher education began as the public relations director at Southern Adventist University (then Southern College of Seventh-day Adventists) in the early 1980s. Since then, she has taught in the School of Business and Management, served as vice president for Marketing and Enrollment Services, and now in her current role as vice president for strategic initiatives.

During her time as an administrator, she served as part of a team that positioned Southern Adventist University for substantial growth. “We developed a strategic plan,” she explained. “We developed a new way of looking at things by taking best practices from many other schools—including those outside the Adventist system—and re-engineering a lot of processes to create growth.”

During the 12 years she directly led the marketing and enrollment initiatives, Southern saw an 83 percent growth in enrollment—adding more than 1,400 students.

Sauder hopes to bring to Union similar processes and strategies to create growth. “Union has a strategic plan in place,” said Sauder. “I am looking forward to joining the administrative team to help accomplish the vision and goals that have been laid out.”

After earning a bachelor’s degree in journalism from Southern Adventist University in 1978, Sauder worked in public relations and as a reporter until joining the Southern staff in 1983. She later earned an MBA from the University of Tennessee Chattanooga School of Business in 1989 and then a doctorate in leadership from the Andrews University School of Education in 2008.

John Wagner was academic dean at Union from 1980 to 1983, then went to Southern Adventist University to serve as president. In 1986, he returned to Union as its president. Wagner left in 1991 to found several nonprofits, and served as pastor at Sligo Church before being called back to Union out of semi-retirement in 2011.

Sauder has big shoes to fill. "

We will miss John Wagner; I know of no one who is so universally loved," said associate professor of English and communication Chris Blake. "He is the patriarch of personal affirmation and a champion for biblical social justice."
Researchers at the University of Western Ontario developed it to determine whether students as early as senior kindergarten have a handle on numeracy skills. It's basic math: seven is larger than five. Three dots represent less than eight dots. But what if some kindergarten students miss this step? Eventually, they land in Grade 3, facing multiplication, and math is a muddle.

Research has shown that a strong understanding of numerical quantity – both in symbols and actual numbers – is an important early predictor for future math success. That's because math is a subject that builds upon itself; students who miss a key step quickly fall behind.

Getting help early is critical, but unlike reading, there are very few math assessments for young students that may explain why they struggle to perform calculations such as addition and subtraction.

Now, Researchers at the University of Western Ontario have developed a two-minute screening test to determine whether students as early as senior kindergarten have a handle on numeracy skills – and to catch those who may be showing signs of early learning problems or who just need extra help.

It's easy to administer, and most of all – given how much both schools and parents pay for testing these days – it's free: The researchers have put it online for anyone to download.

The Toronto District School Board is midway through a three-year trial using the screening test for senior kindergarten students at seven schools, though early results suggest a link between how children score and their Grade One math performance. The board will expand the study to 30 schools in September. If the test proves to be an evidence-based assessment tool, says Roula Anastasakos, the the school board's executive superintendent of research and information services, "we would be using it to flag children who may potentially develop issues."

The remarkably simple test was created by Daniel Ansari¹, the Canada Research Chair in developmental cognitive neuroscience, and Nadia Nosworthy², now an assistant professor at Michigan's Andrews University, because there was a need for math assessments in developing countries that did not require a computer to administer. It can be downloaded at numeracyscreener.org³, along with specific instructions to be followed in explaining the test to the student.

Given to children from senior kindergarten to Grade 3, the object is to identify which of two numbers or symbols are... larger on a series of worksheets. Students answer as many questions as they can in two minutes, and Ansari recommends the screening test be given twice with at least a one-week break in-between. The results can then be entered into the website to see how the score compares with a standardized sample, created by Ansari and his research team after giving the test to hundreds of Southern Ontario students. (The scores that are entered into the site are not currently saved.)

"If you are not very good on this test, you are going to find learning arithmetic very hard because when you learn to calculate you need to know the meaning of the digits and relate those digits to one another," Ansari says. "To us, as adults, it seems such an easy thing to learn. But if you think about it as a child growing up, when they first encounter numeric symbols they are just meaningless shapes, and then they have to connect those symbols to the quantity they represent."

But poor performance on the test, Ansari cautions, is only an indication that a student may need extra help – it's doesn't diagnose a learning disability or replace more extensive testing. In an analysis, the test was only about 70-per-cent accurate in discriminating between students who had dyscalculia (a math disability defined as a difficult to understand or manipulate numbers) and those who didn't.

"In two minutes, you simply cannot diagnose a learning disability," Ansari says. The test is "just one building block in math." Still, parents might use it to determine whether additional testing is needed. (And because it's easily administered, the test may also be used to see how much students improved over the school year.) "It's not going to tell the whole picture, but it's going to tell you something. It can be a starting point to paying more attention to that child."

The Toronto District School Board is beginning to test-drive some possible interventions for students struggling in this area, which Ansari hopes may eventually also be made available on the website.

His team is also considering whether there are other quick assessments to create a more complete "suite" of math tests that teachers might use in the classroom to identify struggling students, even as early as junior kindergarten.

BERRIEN SPRINGS - Nurses, doctors and other hospital personnel don't always get to hear the words "thank you" from patients, but they did Thursday from motivational speaker and burn survivor Allison Massari on behalf of all patients.

Massari, who survived a fiery car crash in 1998 and spent more than a year in the hospital, gave a moving talk to Lakeland Health System employees Thursday morning in a presentation at the Howard Performing Arts Center at Andrews University. Her speech was part of Lakeland's celebration of National Hospital Week.

The California resident told Lakeland workers their efforts are appreciated even if patients don't have the voice or the opportunity to express it. She explained how much it meant to have a nurse touch her hand or say a few words during her months of rehabilitation and recovery.

"I remember the kindness of the nurses. So many times they would stop and just hold my hand," she said. "Those memories have never left me. I was too drained and weak to say a word. ... I'm sure there are many times that you all have gone the extra mile and no one said thanks. You gave anyway. So on behalf of all of them, I say thank you.

"Sometimes you're so stressed and you think there's not enough time, but you can make a difference in a blink of an eye with a smile or a squeeze of a hand. ... "You are the healers of the world whether you are a nurse or a technician or other healthcare worker."

She said compassionate care is about workers being kind and being experts in their fields.

And compassion can be tiring.

"Compassion fatigue is very real," she said. "We have to fill up and nourish the people who are giving care. ... The people here have the most noble jobs in caring for people when they're most vulnerable."

Massari divides her time between art and public speaking. She spoke at length about her experiences and how her recovery taught her so much about life.

She began speaking publicly five years ago. She said she had to overcome fear and anger as she rebuilt her life. She discovered the importance of compassion, love and forgiveness.

One part of rebuilding her life involved finding the man who saved her. She described how one man walked through the flames and pulled her from the burning car while everyone else stood and stared. She was able to find him and hear his story about how saving her had changed his own life.

"What saved me was guts. I learned you can be tenderhearted and fierce," she said. "I learned that from so much pain came so many gifts ... I really believe that life keeps pushing me up to new places to learn to love. It's never ending and it's exhausting but I look at it like everything has a lesson. I still say yes to life."
