Dear Friend,

Russ and Stacy Sweeney lived in an affluent area in Atlanta, Georgia. Each week they faithfully attended church but felt something was missing.

They embarked on a journey of prayer with an intense search of scripture. They came out the other side convinced that God was calling them to minister to those less fortunate.

HOW YOU CAN HELP

To learn more about Global Mission’s Center for Secular and Postmodern Studies, please visit www.secularandpostmodern.com

More than 50 percent of the world's population now live in cities. To reach the people in these urban areas, the Church is establishing Centers of Influence designed to meet their physical and spiritual needs and lead them to Christ. To help fund these Centers of Influence, such as the New Within months, they and their three young children moved into an apartment in the middle of an economically-deprived housing community. Despite their vehicle being stolen several times and the occasional sound of gunfire at night, they continue to model Christ’s method of mingling with people and showing His love.

Not all of us are called to follow Rustin and Stacy in their type of inner-city ministry. But all of us are called to meet and mingle with people like Jesus. Thank you for your continuing prayers and support for Global Mission pioneers around the world who, like Rustin and Stacy, are putting themselves daily in direct contact with those in need.

Blessings,

Gary Krause

In the fall of 2005, Randy Davis sat in his church in New York and listened intently to the director of the local refugee center. As he heard about the struggles and fears of the world’s most vulnerable people, his heart began to beat with excitement. Was God calling him to minister to refugees? And if so, would his church members be willing to help? More
