A few have pointed out that the C.S. Lewis quote I included in yesterday's newsletter contains theological error, so I feel I need to address it.

It was not my intention to support unbiblical theology or an errant message about hell and the "afterlife." I very much appreciate and respect C.S. Lewis's writing and his thoughts, but I am not ignorant to the fact that some of his theology was based on theology we know to be incorrect. That said, what I found poignant about the quote was that we are responsible for and have a part to play in our interactions with those we rub shoulders with. We are either helping them become more like Jesus or driving them away from Him. The consequences of which could have eternal ramifications, either for good or for evil.

Please forgive the possible confusion, and I will try to be more selective about future quotes so as not to cause distress.
